As Chief Information Officer, Barry leads the firm's technology strategy, cybersecurity and digital transformation initiatives, aligning technology with the needs of the business and its clients.

Barry brings more than 20 years of experience in technology and information security, along with a background as an attorney. This combination gives him a distinctive perspective that blends technical depth and sound business judgment with a clear understanding of the legal, regulatory and risk environments in which law firms operate.

His experience also extends to information governance, risk management and regulatory compliance. Throughout his career, Barry has focused on building and evolving technology and security programs that strengthen organizations while enabling innovation, growth and better ways of working. He is known for turning complex technical and risk issues into clear, practical business decisions and actionable plans, and for fostering a strong security culture through leadership, mentorship and training.

Barry believes effective technology leadership goes beyond systems and infrastructure. In his view, it means building strong teams, earning trust across the organization, making thoughtful investments, managing risk pragmatically and ensuring that technology meaningfully advances the goals of the business.

Before Fox Rothschild

Barry previously served as the firm's Director of Information Governance & Information Security. Prior to joining Fox, he served as Head of Security Operations & Response, Engineering and Architecture at AIG and held senior roles in information security at Johnson & Johnson and Credit Suisse.
